A description of ethical challenges and how you've addressed them in your capstone project.

Doing work on any language requires consent from participants, and some work requires consent from entire communities. Previous work with these texts, including glossing and the compilation and upcoming publishing of a book of these texts, has always included the name of the speaker beside the text. Community members have requested that any tools or research that the community would find valuable be provided to the community and relevant researchers, or otherwise be open-source. Thus the speakers will be credited in my project, and I will continue to work with my subject expert and our language consultant on whether providing the corpus explorer to the community would be a desired resource, if it should be open-source and widely available, if it should be kept within the relevant researchers, or some combination of these.

This project was conducted using texts that were gathered with the informed consent of the participants, and under IRB approval.
